The Brain and the Inner World: An Introduction to the Neuroscience of Subjective Experience

By Mark Solms

Introduction

The brain is a complex organ that controls our thoughts, emotions, and actions. But what about our subjective experiences? What is it like to feel joy, sadness, or love? How do we experience the world around us?

The Neuroscience of Subjective Experience

In recent years, neuroscientists have begun to explore the neural basis of subjective experience. This field of research is called neurophenomenology. Neurophenomenologists use a variety of methods to study the brain-mind relationship, including brain imaging, electroencephalography (EEG), and magnetoencephalography (MEG).

The Binding Problem

One of the most challenging problems in neurophenomenology is the "binding problem." This problem refers to the fact that our subjective experiences seem to be unified and coherent, even though they are generated by different parts of the brain. For example, when we see a face, the visual information is processed by one part of the brain, the emotional information by another part, and the semantic information by yet another part. But we experience the face as a single, unified object.

The Role of the Default Mode Network

One possible solution to the binding problem is the default mode network (DMN). The DMN is a network of brain regions that is active when we are not engaged in any specific task. It is thought to play a role in self-awareness, introspection, and the integration of information from different parts of the brain.

Conclusion

The neuroscience of subjective experience is a new and exciting field of research. While we still have much to learn about the brain-mind relationship, neurophenomenology is providing us with new insights into the nature of consciousness and our own inner world.
