word or concept. Over time, the Japanese made changes to this writing style by developing two additional scripts to complement kanji: hiragana and katakana.

What caused the industrialization and modernization of Japan? In reaction to the West's great advancements, Japan's industrialization began in 1870, during the Meiji Restoration. Government leaders called for the improvement of roads, construction of railroads, and further improvements to modernize Japan.

What caused Japan to become imperialist? Japan's need for China's natural resources, in order to speed the process of industrialization and modernization. The popularity of ideologies such as racial superiority and militarism in Japan. Japan's previous history and ideology of expansion into China and other parts of Asia.

What helped Japan modernize? After the Meiji Restoration (1868), Japan began to modernize and to industrialize on the European and American pattern. Western cultural traits were introduced on a large scale through the schools and the mass communication media.

What caused Japan to change? The postwar constitution changed the way the Japanese were governed and also spurred social change. Some of the biggest changes include the role of the emperor, the role of the military and use of military power, and women's rights.

What did the Japanese do to their writing that made it much easier? Phonological spellings with a limited number of symbols were much easier to use. Computers and the increase of access to information also brought in many new loan words that had no established kanji and were written phonologically. Today Japanese writing is still a mix of Chinese kanji, katakana, and hiragana.

How did industrialization lead to imperialism in Japan? This power, continual success, improvement in economy, and rise of the standards of living encouraged a strong nationalism in the people. Due to the newly gained nationalism and industrialized military, Japan became an imperializer to the weaker, less industrialized countries near the island, like Korea and China.

Why was industrialization so important to the Japanese? Prompted by the need to improve the defences of the nation and particularly its sea-going defences in
