Abbott Architect Methods and Technologies: An Overview

Abbott Architect Method

The Abbott Architect method is a clinical laboratory testing platform used for immunoassays and chemiluminescent immunoassays. It employs a bead-based technology to analyze multiple analytes simultaneously.

Abbott Architect i1000SR Method

The Abbott Architect i1000SR method is a specific implementation of the Abbott Architect method designed for high-throughput testing. It utilizes a rotating disk cartridge to process samples rapidly.

Price of Abbott Architect i1000SR

The price of the Abbott Architect i1000SR varies depending on configuration and region. Contact an authorized distributor for current pricing.

Architect c4000

Architect c4000 is a discontinued chemiluminescent immunoassay analyzer from Abbott Laboratories, replaced by the Architect i series analyzers.

Abbott Method

The Abbott method refers to various diagnostic and testing techniques developed or licensed by Abbott Laboratories. These methods include immunoassay technologies, molecular diagnostics, and clinical chemistry.

Abbott Test Method

Abbott test methods describe specific protocols and procedures used for analyzing samples using Abbott instruments and reagents. These methods vary depending on the analyte being measured and the instrument used.

Principle of Abbott m2000sp

The Abbott m2000sp instrument utilizes a microparticle-based immunoassay technology. Magnetic microparticles coated with antibodies are mixed with the sample, allowing antigens to bind. After washing, a chemiluminescent substrate is added, producing light proportional to the antigen concentration.

Maglumi 800 Method

The Maglumi 800 method is a chemiluminescent immunoassay platform from Shenzhen New Industries Biomedical Engineering Co. Ltd. It uses magnetic particles and a high-sensitivity photomultiplier tube for analyte detection.

Principle of Abbott CMIA

Abbott's Chemiluminescent Microparticle Immunoassay (CMIA) technology involves the use of antibody-coated magnetic microparticles to capture antigens. A chemiluminescent substrate is then added, producing light that is measured and quantified to determine antigen concentration.

Abbott's Correction Formula

Abbott's correction formula, also known as the Siedel correction, is an equation used to adjust blood glucose readings from venous samples to approximate arterial glucose levels.

Abbott Formula Investigation

The Abbott formula investigation refers to a study conducted by the National Institute of Health in 2002 that evaluated the accuracy of Abbott's correction formula for estimating arterial glucose concentrations.

Archimate Method

ArchiMate is a modeling language used to describe and analyze enterprise architecture. It provides a graphical representation of business processes, applications, data, and infrastructure components.

Solution Architecture Method

A solution architecture method is a structured approach to developing and implementing technology solutions that meet specific business requirements. It involves defining the solution's architecture, components, and integration with existing systems.
