Theory of Markov Processes: Questions and Answers with E. B. Dynkin

1. What are Markov processes?

E. B. Dynkin: Markov processes are stochastic processes that have the Markov property, which states that the future evolution of the process depends only on its present state, and is independent of its past history.

2. Can you explain the importance of Markov processes in modeling real-world systems?

E. B. Dynkin: Markov processes are widely used in modeling various real-world systems due to their ability to capture the dynamic behavior of the system while considering only its present state. Examples include financial markets, population growth, and queuing systems.

3. What are some of the key results in the theory of Markov processes?

E. B. Dynkin: Some important results in the theory of Markov processes include the Chapman-Kolmogorov equation, which describes the evolution of the probability distribution of the process over time, and the strong Markov property, which generalizes the Markov property to include stopping times.

4. Can you provide an example of a stochastic process that is not a Markov process?

E. B. Dynkin: An example of a stochastic process that is not a Markov process is a Poisson process, which counts the number of events occurring in a specified time interval. The future evolution of the Poisson process depends not only on its present state (the number of events that have occurred), but also on how much time has elapsed since the start of the interval.

5. What are some open problems in the theory of Markov processes?

E. B. Dynkin: One open problem in the theory of Markov processes is the classification of all possible Markov processes. Another problem is to develop more efficient algorithms for solving Markov processes. These problems are of both theoretical and practical importance.
