shaping our identity.

What is the Self Illusion?

According to cognitive scientist Bruce Hood, the self is not a fixed entity but rather a fluid and ever-changing construct that is created by our social brain. Through interactions with others, we develop a sense of who we are and how we fit into the world. This self-concept is not an innate or immutable property but rather a learned and negotiated process.

How the Social Brain Creates Identity

The social brain is a network of brain regions that evolved to enable us to interact and cooperate with others. It plays a crucial role in shaping our self-concept by allowing us to:

- Understand our own perspectives and the perspectives of others: The social brain helps us to see the world from multiple viewpoints and to understand how our thoughts, feelings, and actions are perceived by others.
- Regulate our social behavior: The social brain helps us to conform to social norms, cooperate with others, and avoid conflict. By internalizing social expectations, we develop a sense of what is right and wrong and how to behave in different social situations.
- Develop a sense of belonging: The social brain helps us to identify with groups and communities. By sharing beliefs, values, and experiences with others, we develop a sense of belonging and social identity.

The Implications of the Self Illusion

The self illusion has profound implications for our understanding of human nature and social behavior. For example, it suggests that our sense of self is not as stable or independent as we might believe. Rather, it is constantly being shaped and reshaped by our experiences and interactions with others. This has important implications for our understanding of mental health and social conflict, as well as the nature of personal and social change.
