Tabachnick and Fidell (2007): Frequently Asked Questions

Question 1: What are the main arguments of Tabachnick and Fidell's study?

Answer: Tabachnick and Fidell (2007) conducted a meta-analysis of research on the use of statistical significance testing in psychology. They found that the use of statistical significance testing was often inappropriate and misleading, and that it had a number of negative consequences for psychological research.

Question 2: What is the difference between statistical significance and effect size?

Answer: Statistical significance refers to the probability that a difference between two groups is due to chance. Effect size refers to the magnitude of the difference between two groups. Tabachnick and Fidell argue that effect size is a more important indicator of the meaningfulness of research findings than statistical significance.

Question 3: Why do Tabachnick and Fidell argue that statistical significance testing is often misleading?

Answer: Tabachnick and Fidell argue that statistical significance testing is often misleading because it can lead researchers to conclude that a difference between two groups is meaningful even when it is not. This is because statistical significance testing only takes into account the probability that a difference is due to chance, and it does not take into account the magnitude of the difference.

Question 4: What are some of the negative consequences of the overuse of statistical significance testing?

Answer: Tabachnick and Fidell argue that the overuse of statistical significance testing can have a number of negative consequences for psychological research, including:

- It can lead to the publication of false-positive results.
- It can discourage researchers from conducting studies on small samples.
- It can make it difficult to replicate research findings.

Question 5: What do Tabachnick and Fidell recommend as an alternative to statistical significance testing?

Answer: Tabachnick and Fidell recommend that researchers use effect size as a measure of the meaningfulness of their findings. They also recommend that researchers use confidence intervals to estimate the range of possible values for their effect sizes.
