Section 3 Review: Succession Answers

1. What is the difference between primary succession and secondary succession?

- Primary succession: Occurs on newly exposed or barren land, where no previous plant or animal life has existed.

- Secondary succession: Occurs on land that was previously inhabited but has been disturbed, such as by fire, logging, or agriculture.

2. Describe the four stages of ecological succession.

- Pioneer stage: Dominated by fast-growing, short-lived plants that tolerate harsh conditions.
- Transitional stage: Characterized by a mix of pioneer and shade-tolerant species.
- Maturity stage: A stable community with a diverse range of plants and animals.
- Climax stage: The final and stable stage, where the community is in equilibrium with the environment.

3. Explain the role of disturbance in ecological succession.

- Disturbances can reset the successional clock, creating opportunities for new species to colonize and establish.
- Intermediate levels of disturbance can maintain diversity, preventing any one species from becoming dominant.

4. How does climate change affect ecological succession?

- Climate change can alter plant growth rates, species distributions, and the timing of disturbances, leading to changes in successional pathways.
- In some cases, climate change may accelerate succession, while in others it may slow it down or disrupt it altogether.

5. What are the implications of ecological succession for conservation and land management?

- Understanding succession helps in identifying vulnerable ecosystems and developing strategies to protect them.
- Managing for different stages of succession can promote biodiversity, control invasive species, and maintain ecosystem services.

- Long-term monitoring can track successional changes and inform conservation decisions.
