Student Exploration: Evolution through Natural Selection

Questions:

1. How did the population of beetles change over time?
2. What caused the change in the beetle population?
3. How does this experiment demonstrate the principle of natural selection?
4. How does this experiment relate to the theory of evolution?
5. What are some other examples of natural selection in the real world?

Answers:

Paragraph 1: Beetle Population Change The population of beetles changed over time as the environment changed. In the beginning, the majority of beetles were dark in color. After the environment became lighter, the majority of beetles became light in color. This shift in coloration was a result of the beetles' ability to camouflage themselves from predators.

Paragraph 2: Causes of Beetle Population Change The change in the beetle population was caused by a process known as natural selection. Natural selection is a process by which organisms with traits that are better suited to their environment survive and reproduce more successfully than those with traits that are less suited. In the case of the beetles, their ability to camouflage themselves from predators provided them with an advantage over their darker-colored counterparts.

Paragraph 3: Principle of Natural Selection The experiment demonstrates the principle of natural selection by showing how organisms with traits that are better suited to their environment have a higher chance of surviving and reproducing. This process leads to a change in the population over time, as organisms with less advantageous traits are gradually eliminated.

Paragraph 4: Relationship to the Theory of Evolution The experiment relates to the theory of evolution by providing a simplified example of how natural selection can lead to the evolution of new species. Over time, the population of beetles became lighter in color because the lighter-colored beetles had a competitive advantage in their environment. This process of gradual change over generations is a fundamental mechanism of evolution.

Paragraph 5: Other Examples of Natural Selection Natural selection is a ubiquitous force in nature. Other examples of natural selection include the evolution of antibiotic resistance in bacteria, the evolution of pesticide resistance in insects, and the evolution of beaks in finches that are adapted to different food sources. These examples demonstrate how natural selection drives the adaptation of organisms to their environments, leading to the diversity and complexity of life on Earth.
