Is a basic intuitive principle of package functionality is modularization based on functional cohesion? The basic “intuitive” principle is modularization based on functional cohesion—types are grouped together that are strongly related in terms of their participation in a common purpose, service, collaborations, policy, and function.

What is the difference between modularization and encapsulation? Modularization is the process of putting things of interest into a module and minimizing dependencies upon external things outside the module. High cohesion and low coupling are well-known modularization principles. Encapsulation puts things in a module and protects them by controlling the visibility of outsiders.

What is the major principle of modularization? The basic principle of Modularity is that “Systems should be built from cohesive, loosely coupled components (modules)” which means a system should be made up of different components that are united and work together in an efficient way and such components have a well-defined function.
