more dishonorable.

He is known for his witty poems which feature a conceit and for his two major poetic periods: an early one which dealt with erotic material and a later one which dealt with spiritual material.

What is the conclusion of the flea? But when the beloved kills the flea despite the speaker's protestations (and probably as a deliberate move to squash his argument, as well), he turns his argument on its head and claims that despite the high-minded and sacred ideals he has just been invoking, killing the flea did not really impugn his beloved's honor— ...

How is the flea killed in the poem the flea? It happens between the end of stanza two and the beginning of three. The woman has crushed the flea, even in death a noble martyr: "Cruel and sudden, hast thou since / Purpled thy nail, in blood of innocence?" By turning this accusation into a question, Donne nicely maintains the comic pitch.

What is the main idea of the flea? Sex as a Holy Act of Union A key claim implicit in the speaker's address to his mistress is that sex is a holy act of union. In the first stanza, the speaker begins by rejecting the language of sin and shame. He declares that the mingling of their blood inside the flea “cannot be said / A sin, nor shame” (lines 5–6).

What is the message of the flea poem? In “The Flea,” the speaker tries to seduce his mistress with a surprising (and potentially gross) extended metaphor: both he and she have been bitten by the same flea, meaning their separate blood now mingles inside the flea's body. What does oh stay three lives in one flea spare mean? 'O stay, three lives in one flea spare,' – the 'lives' are the blood of the flea, the speaker and his beloved (though another possibility is that Donne is thinking of a new being, offspring of the 'mingling of bloods,' alongside the 'bloods' of the lovers considered separately).
