New stockings are important for both Willy's pride in being financially successful and thus able to provide for his family and for Willy's ability to ease his guilt about, and suppress the memory of, his betrayal of Linda and Biff.

What is the main point of Death of a Salesman? Death of a Salesman addresses loss of identity and a man's inability to accept change within himself and society. The play is a montage of memories, dreams, confrontations, and arguments, all of which make up the last 24 hours of Willy Loman's life.

Why is Death of a Salesman so tragic? Death of a Salesman has many aspects associated with dramatic tragedy, including a flawed hero, a 'fall' into despair and events that arouse pity and fear. However, unlike traditional tragedies, the play tells of the demise of an everyday domestic figure who could represent any man – or any low man.

Why is Death of a Salesman confusing? The line between reality and illusion is often blurred in Arthur Miller's play, Death of a Salesman. Whether it is incorporated in the content or the actual structure, this struggle between recognizing reality from illusion turns into a strong theme; it eventually leads to the downfall of Willy and his family.

How is Willy's killing himself for the insurance money? At the end of the play, Willy ends up committing suicide by purposely wrecking his car in hopes that his family will receive the insurance money and respect his sacrifice. Tragically, his family resents his suicide and it is unclear if the insurance company will pay the Loman family.

What is the main lesson of Death of a Salesman? All throughout the Death of a Salesman, Loman tells his two sons, Biff and Happy, that the key to success in life is to be "well liked" and that all you need is "a smile and a shoeshine." According to Willy, if you can become popular and get people to like you, you'll have it made in life.

What kind of wife is Linda? Linda is a devoted wife who is desperately trying to cling to the dream of the life she and Willy hoped to have for themselves and their sons. She provides a glimpse into the grim reality of their situation but enables her husband and sons to live in their fantasies of success.

What is the saddest part of the Death of a Salesman? The saddest part of Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman is that Willy Loman never really achieves the success he dreams of. Even sadder is Willy's exuberance as he makes the decision, once and for all, to end his life so that his family can benefit from his life insurance payout.

Who is the villain in Death of a Salesman? Willy Loman can be seen as both the protagonist and antagonist in Death of a Salesman. This is because he evokes sympathy, but is also the cause of his, his sons and his wife's misery. Another interpretation holds that capitalism or the American dream are the real antagonists in the play.

What mental health does the Death of a Salesman have? WILLY LOMAN is a delusional fabulist with signs of senile dementia and possible bipolar disorder. He inflicts his raging anger on any target in sight, from family members to household appliances.
