The Nazi and the Psychiatrist: Hermann Göring's Fatal Meeting with Dr. Douglas M. Kelley at the End of World War II

By Jack El Hai

In the waning days of World War II, a chilling encounter took place between Hermann Göring, the second-in-command of the Nazi regime, and Dr. Douglas M. Kelley, an American psychiatrist. This encounter would have a profound impact on both men and on the course of history.

Kelley's Mission:

Dr. Kelley was sent to Nuremberg to assess the mental fitness of the Nazi leaders standing trial for war crimes. As a psychiatrist, he sought to understand their motivations and psychological makeup.

Göring's Charisma:

Upon meeting Göring, Kelley was struck by his remarkable charisma and intelligence. Despite his crimes against humanity, Göring exuded a sense of authority and self-belief. Kelley was both fascinated and unsettled by his presence.

Fatal Attraction:

As their interactions progressed, Kelley and Göring developed a strange and unsettling connection. Kelley found himself drawn to Göring's intellect and charm, while Göring seemed to find solace in Kelley's psychiatric insights. This "fatal attraction" blurred the lines between patient and doctor, complicating Kelley's mission.

Göring's Confession:

During their sessions, Göring confessed his role in the Holocaust to Kelley. He justified his actions as necessary for Germany's survival, but Kelley detected a deep sense of regret and guilt. This confession would later become a key piece of evidence against Göring at his trial.

Tragic End:

On the eve of his execution, Göring asked for Kelley's presence. As Kelley sat with him in his cell, Göring expressed his remorse for his crimes and asked Kelley to convey his apologies to the Jewish people. This final meeting left a lasting mark on Kelley, who would later argue that Göring was not a monster, but a deeply flawed human being capable of both good and evil.
