Transport Processes and Separation Process Principles: Unit Operations 4th Edition

1. What is the driving force for mass transfer?

Mass transfer occurs due to concentration gradients. In other words, molecules move from areas of high concentration to areas of low concentration to equalize the distribution.

2. What are the different types of mass transfer operations?

Mass transfer operations include:

- Absorption: Transfer of a solute from a gas to a liquid
- Adsorption: Accumulation of a solute on the surface of a solid
- Desorption: Removal of a solute from a solid surface
- Distillation: Separation of liquids based on their boiling points
- Extraction: Separation of solutes between two immiscible liquids

3. What is the difference between diffusion and convection?

Diffusion is the movement of molecules due to random molecular motion. Convection is the movement of molecules due to bulk fluid flow.

4. What is a unit operation?

A unit operation is a physical operation used to transform a raw material into a desired product. Examples of unit operations include:

- Crushing: Reducing the particle size of a solid
- Mixing: Combining two or more materials
- Filtration: Separating solids from liquids
- Heat transfer: Transferring heat from one medium to another

5. What are the applications of transport processes and separation process principles?

These principles have applications in various industries, including:
