The Best of Everything: A Conversation with Rona Jaffe

Q: What inspired you to write "The Best of Everything"?

A: I was working at Seventeen magazine and saw firsthand the challenges and pressures facing young women in the post-war era. I wanted to create a story that reflected their experiences and the societal expectations they faced.

Q: The novel explores themes of ambition, success, and female identity. How did you approach these topics?

A: I wanted to portray the characters as complex individuals with both strengths and flaws. I explored how their ambitions and desires shaped their lives and the choices they made. The novel also examines the societal expectations placed on women and how these could limit their potential.

Q: "The Best of Everything" has been praised for its authentic depiction of female friendship. What was your inspiration for the characters of Caroline, April, and Gregg?

A: I drew inspiration from the women I knew in my own life. I wanted to create characters who were relatable, supportive, and aspirational. Each of them has her own unique voice and journey, but they all share a deep bond.

Q: The novel has also been criticized for its bleak portrayal of women's experiences. Was this your intention?

A: I did not intend to present a solely negative view of women's experiences. Rather, I wanted to illustrate the challenges and obstacles they faced in the particular time and place depicted in the novel. However, I also included moments of hope and resilience, showing that women could persevere despite the difficulties they encountered.

Q: "The Best of Everything" has been adapted several times for film and television. How do you feel about these interpretations of your work?

A: I am proud that my novel has had such a lasting impact. I think each adaptation has brought its own unique perspective to the story, while remaining faithful to the core themes and characters. I am grateful that readers and viewers continue to connect with "The Best of Everything" and find inspiration in its message of empowerment and resilience.
