Works of Love: Kierkegaard's WikiQuote

Question: What is Kierkegaard's view on works of love?

Answer: Kierkegaard believed that true love is not simply a feeling or emotion, but an active, sacrificial commitment towards others. He argued that genuine expressions of love are characterized by selflessness, compassion, and a desire to serve the well-being of another.

Question: How does Kierkegaard differentiate between works of love and works of duty?

Answer: Kierkegaard distinguished between "works of love" and "works of duty." Works of love are performed freely and spontaneously out of genuine affection for another, while works of duty are done out of obligation or compulsion. According to Kierkegaard, true love goes beyond mere duty and involves a genuine desire to benefit and care for the other person.

Question: What are some examples of Kierkegaard's teachings on works of love?

Answer: Kierkegaard emphasized the importance of serving others, even in the face of difficulties. He wrote, "Love does not demand or calculate, but gives freely and without measure." Kierkegaard also believed that forgiveness and reconciliation were essential expressions of love, stating that "love is stronger than any wound."

Question: How did Kierkegaard's writings on works of love influence others?

Answer: Kierkegaard's ideas about love have had a profound impact on religious, philosophical, and psychological thought. His writings have inspired countless people to reflect on the nature of love and the importance of selfless service.

Question: What are some notable quotes by Kierkegaard on works of love?

Answer: Some of Kierkegaard's most famous quotes on works of love include:

- "True love is not a feeling of sentimentality, but a desire to serve."
- "Love is a creative force that brings good into the world."
- "The greatest proof of love is sacrifice."
- "Love is not about receiving, but about giving."
