System Analysis and Design Notes for PGDCA

Q: What is system analysis? A: System analysis involves studying a system to gather information about its purpose, functions, and constraints. It helps identify areas for improvement or redesign to meet user requirements and business objectives.

Q: What is system design? A: System design follows system analysis and involves creating a detailed blueprint for a new or redesigned system. It includes defining system architecture, components, and processes to ensure the system meets user needs and operational requirements.

Q: What are the key steps in system analysis and design? A: The key steps include:

- Planning: Define the scope and goals of the analysis and design process.
- Requirements gathering: Collect information from stakeholders to determine user needs and system requirements.
- Analysis: Study the existing system and identify potential issues, opportunities, and constraints.
- Design: Create a blueprint for the new or redesigned system based on the analysis results.
- Implementation and testing: Implement the design and test the system to ensure it meets requirements and functions as intended.

Q: What are the benefits of using structured techniques in system analysis and design? A: Structured techniques provide a systematic approach that:

- Improves communication and understanding among stakeholders.

- Facilitates documentation and traceability of requirements.

- Reduces risks and errors during design and implementation.

Q: What are some common tools and techniques used in system analysis and design? A: Common tools include flowcharts, data flow diagrams, and use case diagrams. Techniques include modeling, prototyping, and simulation to represent and evaluate system functionality.
